Arianna Huffington Joins Uber's Board of Directors

April 27, 2016 | Posted by Travis

Today, I'm excited to announce that Arianna Huffington will join Uber's board.

For those of us who know Arianna, it's clear she knows a thing or two about being an entrepreneur. As the founder and editor-in-chief of The Huffington Post, she's built one of the most successful, innovative media companies in the world... from scratch. And on top of that, she's a best-selling author. Yes, just thinking about her day is exhausting—though I should add her latest bestseller is about the importance of sleep!

She recalled a panicked phone call from her former sister-in-law, Terry, who needed a ride for her daughter, who was stuck in Brooklyn during a snowstorm. Terry had tried every car service in town before calling her. "No problem," Arianna said. "Tell Lindsay to look outside her window—there will be a car waiting for her in five minutes." The crowd roared when she told them, "For the first time in my life, I felt like a genuine Greek goddess."

That ability to tell stories is invaluable for an engineer like me, whose natural tendency is to rely on data. As I've discovered, that doesn't always work perfectly. So it's Arianna's emotional intelligence that I am most excited to learn from. She's one of the few people who begins every conversation by asking how you are, not how your business is doing. I'm confident she will bring some ethos and pathos to our Uber logos.

Arianna embodies the type of optimistic leadership we need as Uber continues to grow. Her guidance has been invaluable to me personally over the years, and I know that in this new role she'll help take Uber to the next level.
